into which it enters are practically unlimited in number. The more important, including those that are in any way specialized, or that require separate explanation, are treated in their alphabetical places as Main Words. (In the case of ME. words in bi-, by-, all that survived long enough to have Be- appear under this spelling; a few that became obsolete at an early date are left under their only extant form in Bi-, By-.) Those of less importance, infrequent (often single) occurrence, and obvious composition, are arranged under the following groups (in which, however, the senses tend to overlap each other, so as to make the place of some of the words ambiguous):—

1. Forming derivative verbs, with sense of 'around': a. all round externally, on all sides, all over the surface, as in BESER, BESMEAR; b. from side to side (within a space), to and fro, in all directions, in all ways, in or through all its parts, thoroughly, as in BESTIB, bejumble. (Some of these formations appear only in the pa. pple.)

Bebang, to bang about; † bebass, to kiss all over, cover with kisses; bebaste (with a cudgel, or with gravity); † bebat, to becadged; bebatte, be-bite; beblar, to blar all over; beblotch, † beboss, bebotch, bebrush; † becense, to perfume with incense; bechase, to chase about; becircle; beclart dial., to be dirty; beclasp; becompass, to compass about; becramp; † becrampoun, to set (a jewel); becrimson, becrust; † becurry, to curry one's hide, belabour; becurse, to cover with curses; becut, bedamn, bedamp, bediaper; † bedowse, to souse with water; bedrape, bedrift, bedrive, be-embroider, befan; befinger, to finger all over; befleck, to cover with flecks; befrookle, befritz; † befrounce, to frounce or toss about, touzle; † begarnish, begash, begaud, begirdle; † behale, to drag about; behammer, † behem; † behorewe, to befoul; bejig, to jig about; bejumble, † beknit (OE. becnyttan), belave, beliak, bemingle, bemix, bepaste; be-paw, to befoul as with paws; bepen, to pen in; bepommel; † bepounce, to stud; beprank, to prank out or over; bepuddle (e.g. a spring); bepurple; † bequirtle, to besprinkle; berake, to rake all over; † beroll, to roll over; † beround, bescour, beseam, behackle, † besield, be-shroud; † bealab, to beplaster; bealash, † be-slur; bealurry, to sully all over; beasmother, beasmudge († beasmouche); † besow (OE. besdwān), to sow about; † besperple, to bespatter; bespin, to spin round, so as to cover; bespirt; † besquatter, to bespatter with filth; bestamp, † bestroke, † beswitch, betinge, † be-turn, beveil, † bewallow (OE. bevaltwian), bewash, bewater, bewhiten, bewreath. 7. Forming participial adjectives, which unite the preceding senses, esp. 6 and 2, in the notion of 'covered or furnished with,' usually in a conspicuous, ostentatious, unnecessary, or overdone way. In modern use (e.g. with Carlyle) the force of the be- is often merely rhetorical, expressing depreciation, ridicule, or railery, on the part of the speaker, towards the appendage or ornamentation in question; cf. booted and bebooted, gartered and begartered, wigged and bewigged. Some of these words have no form without be-, and closely approach the verbs in 5, e.g. bedaughtered, bepilgrimed, 'overrun with pilgrims.' This is now the most frequent use of be-, and the formations of this kind are endless; e.g. bebelled, beboaked, becoroneted, becupolad, bediamonded, befathered, beflogged, be-flooned, bemitred, bemuslined, beperiwigged, beribboned, beringletted, besleeved, beturbaned, be-uncled, bewinged. Beach (bēch), sb. Forms: 6- beach; also 6 baeche, bayche, 7 beatch, 7-8 baich (e, 8 beech). [Origin unknown: apparently at first a dialect word, meaning, as it still does in Sussex, Kent, and the adjacent counties, the shingle or pebbles worn by the waves. Thence the transference of the term to the place covered by 'beach,' was easy for those who heard such phrases as 'to lie' or 'walk on the beach,' without knowing the exact significance. The Fr. grève shows precisely the same transference. The spelling shows that the pronunciation in 16-18th c. was (bēf). If OE., the type would be bēce. A derivation from ON. bakk 'bank,' which has been proposed (for sense 3), is not admissible phonologically: (cf. BACHE). Another conjecture would derive beach from bleach = OE. blāc, f. blāc white, with loss of l, of which there is however no evidence.]

Possibly it is from F. be-guile, f. bler to gape, open wide + guile throat. The OF. bequeuile, according to Godefroy, meant a noisy shouting person (criailleur); 'open throat', in this sense, might be an epithet applied to a dog, though there is no evidence that it was so used in Fr.]

[As applied to stock thus sold, bear appears early in 18th c., and was common at the time of the South Sea Bubble. The term 'bearskin jobber,' then applied to the dealer now called the 'bear,' makes it probable that the original phrase was 'sell the bearskin,' and that it originated in the well-known proverb, 'To sell the bear's skin before one has caught the bear.' The associated BULL appears somewhat later and was perhaps suggested by bear.]

(The compound form, Goth. ga-bairan, OHG. ga-beran, OS. gi-beran, OE. geberan, ME. IBERE, is in some of the langs. more usual than the simple verb: cf. MHG. gebern, mod.G. gebären in sense IV.) As the senses of carry a burden, and bring forth fruit or offspring, are both found in the word and its derivatives in the Aryan languages generally, from the earliest period, it is not certain which is the primitive; possibly branch IV preceded I in prehistoric times. In mod.Eng. the originally short vowel of the present has been lengthened by position (orig. ber, now bēar). The pa. t., in Gothic bar, pl. bēaron, was regularly in OE. ber, bēaron (Anglian bēron); early ME. bar, beren, afterwards by levelling of sing. and pl., in south ber, beren, beeren, in north bar(e), baren, bare, which became the literary form. The later bore, assimilated in vowel to the pa. pple., appears in w. midl. texts, about 1400; it was not general till after 1600; the Shaks. folio of 1623 has bore and bare, but the Bible of 1611 only bare. The corresponding Sc. bur, buir (pointing to earlier ō) is found in 15th c. As to the two forms of the pa. pple., borne, born, see 44 below. The ME. iboren may also be referred to the derivative IBERE (see above), which cannot be separated in sense from the simple verb.]

44. The various forms of the pa. pple. had formerly no distinction of sense. In the earlier part of the 17th c., these were borne (usual), born, bore (rare). About 1660, borne (the only spelling in Shaks. folio of 1623) was generally abandoned, and born (cf. born, worn) retained in all senses, with bore as a frequent variant (the latter perhaps not in sense of nātus). Dr. Johnson, in his various edd. from 1751 to 1773, says under BEAR, 'part. pass. bore or born,' and the same is found in other dicta. and grammars of the period. But c 1775, a different usage (which some writers or printers had observed as early as 1750) was established: bore (common in Addison, Swift, Thomson) was abandoned, borne was reinstated, and now used as the ordinary form, and born was restricted to a specific sense. Thus, borne is now the only pa. pple., active or passive, in senses 1-42 (he has borne a burden, the tree has borne fruit, the testimony borne by him); it is also used in sense 43 in the active always, and in the passive with by and name of the mother, that is when it has the literal sense of 'brought forth.' Born is used only in sense 43, and there only in the passive, when not followed by by and the mother; it has rather a neuter signification = 'come into existence, sprung' without explicit reference to maternal action; hence it is the form used adjectively, and figuratively. Cf. 'She had borne several children, the children borne to him by this woman, born of the Virgin Mary, born in a stable, her first-born son, a lady born, new-born zeal, a flower born to blush unseen.'

Beat (bāt, bāt), v. 2 [Either the direct derivative, or immediate source, of BEAT sb. 3, q. v.]

(Marshall in 1796 (Eng. Dial. Soc. B. vi. p. 70) seems to identify this with BEAT v. 1; others have tried to identify it with BEAT v. (M.E. beten), either in the sense of improving the soil, or of kindling, or feeding fire, which seems phonetically inadmissible, even if the sense were more probable.)

To slice off the rough sod from uncultivated or fallow ground, with a beat-ax or breast-plough, in order to burn it, for the purpose at once of destroying it, and of converting it into manure for the land. Hence BEATING vbl. sb.; and the compound Beat-ing-ax = BEAT-AX (under BEAT sb. 3).

Beat (bāt, dial. bāt), sb. 2 Forms: 5 betō, 6 belt, 7 bayt, 8 bait, 8—beat, 9 beet. [Of uncertain form and etymology; the 15th c. bete and 18th c. frequent bait, point to beat as the 16th c. and normal modern form, bait being only a phonetic variant at a time when the pronunciation was still (bāt) as in great, and beet being a modern phonetic spelling since the pronunc. became (bīt) as in meat, meet. Possibly from the vb. beat, in sense of a 'beating,' or quantity to be beaten at once; see BEAT v. 24, and cf. stack, etc.] A bundle of flax or hemp made up ready for steeping.

c 1450 HENRYSON Mor. Fab. 60 The Lint ryped, the Churle pulled the Lyne, Riplid the bolles, and in beites it set; It steeped in the burne, and dried syne, And with ane beittel knocked it and bet, Syne swyngled it well, and hekked in the stet. a 1500 Cath. R. Agric. Soc. VIII. II. 453 The flax ... must be tied up in small sheaves or beats.

Beat (bāt, bāt), sb. 3 Forms: also 7 baite, 7—9 bait, 8—9 bate. [Of doubtful phonetic form, and unknown origin. The modern Devonsh. pronunciation is (bāt), variously spelt bait, bate, beat. Although bait occurs constantly in Gervaise Markham, beat was the spelling of the vb. with Fitzherbert in 1534, Carew in 1602, and of the sb. with Worlidge in 1681, and is apparently the proper form. The vb. is found nearly a century before the sb., and may thus be its immediate source, but on general grounds, the converse is more likely.]

The suggestion that beat is another form of PEAT, is incompatible with the history of the latter, q. v. The ON. beit 'pasturage,' beiti 'pasture,' also 'heath, ling,' would barely do for the sense, and phonetically would give bait, not beat. See BEAT v. 2.]

The rough sod of moorland (with its heath, gorse, etc.), or the matted growth of fallow land, which is sliced or pared off, and burned (at once to get rid of it and to make manure), when the land is about to be ploughed. or whether it was a transference from a bed for sleeping, with reference to its shape or purpose.]

1. The sleeping-place of men or animals.

A permanent structure or arrangement for sleeping on, or for the sake of rest. In some form or other it constitutes a regular article of household furniture in civilized life, as well as part of the equipment of an army or expedition. It consists for the most part of a sack or mattress of sufficient size, stuffed with something soft or springy, raised generally upon a 'bedstead' or support, and covered with sheets, blankets, etc., for the purpose of warmth. The name is given both to the whole structure in its most elaborate form, and, as in 'feather-bed,' to the stuffed sack or mattress which constitutes its essential part. (A person is said to be in bed, when undressed and covered with the bedclothes.)

8-9 bedeen. [ME. bidene, a word of constant occurrence in northern ME. verse, but of uncertain origin; its senses run partly parallel with those of ANON, but it is often used without any appreciable force, as a rime word, or to fill up the measure. Its latter part is almost certainly the early ME. adv. ene, ene, OE. ēne 'once, at once, in one, together' (cf. the ME. phrases at ene at once, for ene for once, and see ENE); but the bid- is difficult of explanation.

Marsh and Mätzner compared Du. bijdien, MDu. biden, biden, LG. biden 'by that, thereby, beside that,' which must be discarded; Stratmann compared LG. binene ('for bi ene), and suggested that bidene might be for bi ene, but offered no explanation of the -d-. Prof. Zupitza (note to Guy of Warwick, 15th c. version, l. 2408) suggests a corruption of mid ene*, comparing MHG. miten, mit ene, 'together, and'. This completely suits the sense; also, the change of initial m to b, though unusual, is not unexampled; cf. esp. MHG. bitalle for mit alle 'wholly, entirely.' But there are historical difficulties in the non-appearance of mid ene* in OE., or of mid ene, bidene, in early southern ME., where alone mid was retained; in the rise and use of bidene in the north, where mid was not retained in ME.; and in the fact that the Old Northumbrian had not mid, but mið, so that the Anglian form would have been mið ene. These difficulties are only partially removed, if, for mid, we start from the more northern witth. In the Old Usages of Winchester (E. E. Guilds), we see witth-inne, witth-outte, transformed into by-pinne, by-powte, through assimilation to by; similarly witth ene*, witth ene*, might be changed into bi-dene*, by-pene*; but the change of the latter into bi-dene, would still remain to be explained.]

1. In one body or company, together. All bedene: all together; altogether, completely. Cf. The relation between the Heb. and Gr. words is not settled. The earlier Eng. translations, and the Douay, followed the Vulgate in identifying them in form, but the Geneva Bible of 1560, followed by the 'Authorized' of 1611, represent the O. II. To beet a fire.

[The development of this (the chief extant) sense, the antiquity of which is shown, not merely by the OS. fyr bētan, but by its existence in the other Teutonic languages (cf. Du. vuur boeten, LG. für böten, etc.), is somewhat obscure, from the fact that in the earliest instances it appears to mean, not 'to mend a fire,' but as in modern Dutch, 'to make, kindle, put on a fire.' Perhaps this is to be explained by the primitive conditions (which prevailed more or less till the days of phosphorus matches), according to which fire was not generated anew each time it was required, but was usually propagated by a 'glede' from an existing fire, often carried and kept alive for days (cf. Genesis xxii. 6), which was surrounded with combustibles, and 'beeted' into a blaze, when a fire was required.]

Those like bittile show the ordinary shortening of a long vowel before two consonants: thus, the OE. genitive bittles, and plur. bittas, would naturally give bittles in ME. The form betyl, pointing to a nom. betel, has not been etymologically explained, but it may, if genuine, be the source of ME. betylle, 16th c. betel, mod. beetle, though the latter may also be from the normal bitela, with the vowel lengthened, as in evil from OE. yfel, weevil from OE. wifel (OHG. wibil), Sc. meikle from OE. mycil, dial. leete from litle, etc. The later forms are confused with those of BEETLE *sb.*¹, whence also confusion in their fig. use: see sense 3.]

Beetle (bē'tl), 1a. in Beetle brows, beetle-browed. Forms: 4 bitel, bytel, 1 betyl, bittill, 6 beetell, -ill, -yll, 7 betle, bittle, 6-beetle. [Found first in the comb. beetle-browed (1532); much later (1532), beetle is treated as a separate word in beetle brow(s); whence a derived verb to BEETLE (see next) formed by Shakspeare.

(As the 14-15th c. form had bitel, bytel, it has been proposed to identify it with BITEL a. 'biting, cutting like a sharp-edged tool,' used by Ormin and Layamon, which is phonetically possible; but, beside the hardly satisfactory sense, there is the difficulty that bitel appears to have been obsolete for 160 years when the first example of bitel- browed occurs. It is more likely that the word here is one of the two sbs. BEETLE, both extant in 14th c., and both having the form bitel. The choice depends largely upon the exact meaning originally attached to 'beetle-browed,' which was a reproachful epithet, and appears to have referred to the shaggy prominence of the eye-brows. (Brow in ME. was always = eyebrow, not = forehead.) It is probable therefore (as suggested by Dr. F. Chance) that the comparison is to the short tufted antennæ of some species of beetles, projecting at right angles to the head, which may have been called 'eyebrows' in Eng. as well as in Fr.; for in French the expression sourcils de hanneton 'cockchafers' eyebrows' is the name given to a species of fringe made in imitation of the antennæ of these insects.)]

1. Beetle-browed: 'Having prominent brows,' Johnson; 'having black and long eye-brows,' Bailey (1782); with earlier authorities 'Having shaggy, bushy, or prominent eye-brows'; see esp. quot. 1400, 1591. Dr. Johnson's explanation probably owes something to the sense attached to BEETLE *v.*¹ Almost always reproachful, and sometimes in 17th c. simply = Lowering, scowling, sullen, surly. Cf. supercilious f. L. supercilium 'eyebrow.'

[The notion that beg had to do with the bag carried by a beggar, as if he were a 'bagger', finds no etymological corroboration. The Flemish beggen appeared to by Littré under Beguin has no existence (Cosijn). Mr. H. Sweet has suggested that ME. beggen might be worn down from the rare OE. bedecian 'to beg', found once (in Past. Care), and obscurely connected with Gothic bidagwa 'beggar', f. bidjan 'to ask, beg'. This has much to recommend it; but the phonetic connexion of beggen and bedecian is by no means established, and there is the serious historical difficulty that no connecting links are to be found, there being no trace of the word in any form between K. Ælfred's bedecian before 900 and the regular use of the modern beg and beggar in the 13th c. Perhaps the most likely derivation is from the OF. begari, begard, and begar, med. L. begardus = BEGHARD, or its synonym beguin, BEGUIN, and deriv. vb. beguigner, beguiner 'to take the beguin'. It is known that the Beghards or Beguins were, or soon became, a lay mendicant order, and that in the 13th c. mendicants calling themselves, or called, by these names, swarmed over Western Europe, 'laici, qui sub pretextis cuiusdam religionis fictæ Begardos se appellant... qui extra religionem approbatam validam mendicantes discurrunt' (Council of Treves 1310). It is notable that in one of the two passages where Britton has Anglo-French begger to beg (see 4 above), the reading of two 14th c. MSS. is beguigner, showing that this was at any rate identical in sense with 'beg'. So also we find in Sym. de Hesdin a 1380 (Godef.), 'il n'y eust pas tant de begars et de begardes qui mengas...

sent leur pain en oiseuse' (there would not have been so many begards, male and female, to eat their bread in idleness), which strongly suggests the Eng. beggar. About this time the words beggars and beggen arose in English: the exact process of their formation, and their actual relation to each other can only be conjectured: possibly beggen was shortened from beguin-er, possibly it was taken from beggar-er, and this directly from OF. begar above. The -are of the Ancien Riwele proves nothing, being the regular agent ending, as seen in bachitare, demare, renare, etc.]

† Beg, sb. Obs. Also 7 beog. [a. Osmanli beg 'prince, governor', now pronounced as bey: see BEY, and cf. BEGUM.] A bey. Now only used as part of Eastern names. Beg beg = BEGLEBEG.

Beghard (beg'gärd). [ad. med.L. beghardus, begardus, begardus, begehurdus, begihardus (see Du Cange); cf. F. béguard, OF. béguart, Flemish beggaert, MHG. beghart, begehart, either directly from the same word as BEGUINE (i.e. the surname Bégué), or at a later date from béguine itself, with the masc. ending -ard, -hard, here pejorative; see -ARD. OF. had also a masc. béguin, in which the pejorative sense was absent; and a fem. bégarde formed on béguart, with its reproachful force.

This word has been the subject of much etymological conjecture. An extraordinary error, which appears even in Littré, refers it to an alleged Flemish beggen 'to beg', which never existed. (On the contrary, OF. béguart may be the source of the English beggar and beg; see these words.) It has been by some referred directly to the adj. bégué 'stammerer', as if it meant originally 'stammerer', and has been 'derived' in various other ways. But its origination in the name of Lambert Bégué is now established beyond all dispute (Prof. Cosijn).

A name given to the members of certain lay brotherhoods which arose in the Low Countries early in the 13th c., subsequent to, and in imitation of, the female BEGUINES. 'They took no vow, and were allowed to leave the company when they liked.' The name is said soon to have been adopted by many who were simply idle mendicants: see BEGGAR. From the 14th c. they were denounced by Popes and Councils, and persecuted by the Inquisition. In the 17th c. such of them as still survived were absorbed in the Tertiarii of the Franciscans. (The name was sometimes thrown abusively at other 'heretics', as the Albigenes and Waldenses.)

[Of common WGer. or ?Otent. formation: OE. bi-, be-ginnan is identical with OS. and OHG. bi-ginnan, MHG., mod.G., Du. be-ginnen, MDu. beghinnen; f. bi-, BE- about + ginnan, an original Teutonic vb., of which however only compounds have come down to us, including (beside the preceding) Goth. du-ginnan to begin, OE. gn-ginnan, a-ginnan, to begin, OHG. in-ginnan. MHG. en-ginnen. The latter (OHG. and MHG.) had the senses 'to cut open, open up, begin, undertake'; hence it is inferred that the root sense of ginnan* was 'to open, open up,' and that it was cogn. w. ON. gína, OE. gínan 'to gape, yawn,' from a stem gi-*, appearing also in OSlav. zj-ati, L. hi-äre 'to gape, open' = Aryan ghi-*. 'Gi-nan might originally be a form of the nu- class, in which, as in ri-nan, ski-nan, and other verbs, the formative of the present was carried over into the other tenses' (Sievers). The transition of sense from 'open up' to 'begin,' is a frequent one: cf. F. entamer, Eng. ATTAME; also Ger. eröffnen and Eng. 'open' a speech, 'open' fire, 'open up' negotiations; also the parallel use of 'close, close up, conclude, shut up,' in sense of 'to end.' Beginnan was very rare in OE., where the ordinary word was ginnan: see ONGIN, AGIN, and the aphetic GIN, GAN. As in other verbs having grammatical vowel change in the pa. t., there was an early tendency to level the forms of the 1-3 sing. began, and of the 2 sing. beginne, pl. beginnon, which has resulted in the establishment of began as the standard form; but an alternative from the old plural begin has also come down to the present day. The rare pa. pple. began shows form-levelling in another direction. The Sc. forms begouth, begoud, seem due to some form-association with couth, could, probably through the aphetic form gan, which became in Sc. can, and was thus identical in form with can 'to be able.']

Beguina (bĕgīnə), sb. [f. BEGUILLE.]

† Beguina (bĕgīnə), sb. [f. BEGUILLE.] An establishment of, or house for, beguines; often giving a name to a part of a town in the Low Countries.

1815 SOUTHEY in C. Southey Life & Corr. IV. 127. 1819 — in Q. Rev. XXII. 94. The house at Little Gidding bore no resemblance whatever to a beguine. 1854 H. STRICKLAND Trav. Th. 26. Beguine (beg'in, begin). Forms: 5 bygyn, begyne, 6 begine, -ghine, -gyn, biggayne, 7 beguin, beggin, 6- beguine. [a. F. biguine (13th c. in Littré), in med. L. beguina, begina, beghina (Du Cange), an appellative derived from the surname of Lambert Bègue or le Bègue ('the Stammerer'), a priest of Liège, in the 12th c., the founder of the order.

(Cf. the annal of 1180, quoted in Du Cange: 'God stirred up the spirit of a certain holy priest, a man of religion, who was called Lambert le Bègue (because he was a stammerer) of St. Christopher (in Liège), from whose surname women and girls who propose to live chastely, are called Beguines, because he was the first to arise and preach to them by his word and example the reward of chastity.' The cap beguin derives its name from them, and not vice versa.)

A name for the members of certain lay sisterhoods which began in the Low Countries in the 12th century, who devoted themselves to a religious life, but did not bind themselves by strict vows, and might leave their societies for marriage. They were protected by Pope John XXII, when he persecuted the male Beguins or Beghards, and are still represented by small communities existing in the Netherlands, with an organization somewhat similar to some Anglican sisterhoods.

the blending of the two earlier constructions on his halve and bihalve him, both meaning 'by or on his side': see HALF. By the mixture of these in the construction on his bihalve, BIHALV, previously a preposition, and originally a phrase, be healfe 'by (the) side,' became treated, so far as construction goes, as a sb., and had even a plural behalves, behalfs in 16-17th c. The final -e of ME. was the dative ending. In modern use, construed either with a possessive pronoun (in my behalf), a possessive case (in the king's behalf), or with of (in behalf of the starving population); the choice being determined by considerations of euphony and perspicuity. Formerly of was sometimes omitted.]

† Behight, v. Obs. For forms see below. [An OE. compound vb.: OE. bi-, behátan = OHG. biheizan, Goth. bihátan (in derivatives), f. bi-, BE- + OE. hátan = Goth. hátan to call, pa. t. hahátit, (= hehátit), pa. pple. haitans. The reduplicated pa. t. appeared in OE. as heht (— he hat: — hehátit: — hehátit), contr. hét (pl. hétan). As there was no other Eng. vb. exactly parallel, the isolated inflexion of hátan and behátan was in ME. subjected to a remarkable series of changes, resulting finally in the loss of the original present stem, and the substitution of that of the past as a new present, with weak inflexions. 1. The OE. original forms of the pres. behátan, and pa. pple. behátan, gave regularly the ME. behoite and behoiten (to c 1255). The OE. pa. t. behét gave ME. behet (— heet, — hete), found after 1400; beheht gave biheght, — height, more usually behijt, — hight (— hyht, — hyght, and in 15th c. — hite). But in the course of the 14th c., the normal forms, behoite, behet — height — hight, behoiten, began to be disturbed under the influence of levelling, and of various assumed analogies. 2. Thus, the Present took the vowel of the then archaic past, and became behoite, — heete, frequent in Wyclif, Chaucer, and Lydgate. The Past was occasionally assimilated to the pple. as behoite, behoite; but far more frequently the pple. was assimilated to the pa. t., first as behet, — heete, then as beheght, behight, in 16th c. also behoite. The Past behoite was then made weak, as be-height-e (3 syllables; cf. forms like michte, lighte); and finally behight (behoite) was taken as present, and the pa. t. and pple. duly became in 16th c. behighted (behited); cf. lighted for earlier lighte. Rare forms of the pa. t. were

c 1400 behit (cf. lit = lighted), and in 16th c. behoited, formed on the original present behoite. See further under the simple HIGHT v. Towards the end of the 16th c. behight became obsolete, but was kept up by the Spenserian archaists, who often misunderstood its meaning, and employed it in mistaken senses.]

mechanically perpetuated by subsequent dictionaries: Carew's word is beholdingness, q. v.

Beholding, ppl. a. [f. as prec. + -ING². Sense 1 evidently originated in an error for BEHOLDEN, either through confusion of the endings (cf. esp. the 15th c. spelling -yne for -en), or, more probably, after beholden was shortened to beholde, behold, and its grammatical character obscured; the general acceptance of 'beholding' may have been due to a notion that it meant 'looking (e.g. with respect, or dependence)', or to association with the idea of 'holding of' or 'from' a feudal superior. (It was exceedingly common in the 17th c., for which no fewer than 97 instances have been sent in by our readers.)]

The phonetic history shows that the word cannot be connected with ON. beinn, to which, in its fig. sense of 'hospitable', some have plausibly referred it; that word duly survives in north. Eng. as BAIN. Others have turned to the L. bene or Fr. bien well; but it is not intelligible how either of these could have been adopted in Eng. as an adjective, which appears to have been the earlier use of bene.]

A pun on the name Isabella].

B. Used as a formative prefix in belfader, belsire, beldame, belmoder, grandfather, grandmother. The explanation of this use, which seems to be entirely English and unknown to French, is not clear; but it answers to the Eng. use of good in goodsire (gudscher, gutcher), gooddame (gudame), 'godson or gosson filiolus, and 'goddowter filiola, in Prompt. Parv., which is again partly paralleled by the mod. F. bon-papa, bonne-maman, grandpapa, grandmamma. The French and English use of grand, in grandpère grandfather, grandsire, grand'mère grandmother, grandame, is capable of more obvious explanation; while the tendency to allow analogy to prevail over sense appears in the Eng. grandson as compared with F. petit-fils. Still further analogies in the parallel use of beau, belle, and good (though to express a different relationship) are presented by the F. beau-père father-in-law, belle-mère mother-in-law, beau-frère brother-in-law, etc., for which the north. Eng. and Sc. forms are good-father, good-mother, good-brother, good-sister, etc.

Bela'ce, v. 'Sea Term. To fasten; as to belace a rope.' Johnson. [This is found only in Dictionaries. It appeared first in Bailey's folio, 1730, was retained by Dr. Johnson (who used a copy of that as the basis of his own work), and from him it has been perpetuated by later dictionaries. In Bailey it appears to be merely a mistake for BE-LAGE, q. v. Bailey's 8vo of 1721 (like the earlier dictionaries of Phillips and Kersey) has 'Belage, also Belay (Sea Term.), to fasten any running Rope when it is haled, that it cannot run forth again.' This the folio of 1730 splits up into 'Belace (Sea Term.), to fasten any Rope,' and 'Belay, to fasten any running Rope, so that when it is haled it cannot run out again.' Thence Johnson's Belace and Belay. But the 8vo editions of Bailey retained the original entry and took no notice of Belace, till after the appearance of Johnson's Dictionary, when the editor of the edition of 1783 added the fictitious Belace from Johnson, while retaining Bailey's original Belage or Belay.]

Belfried (be'friad), ppl. a. [f. BELFRY + -ED 2.] Having a belfry.

1841 LADY F. HASTINGS Poems 150 The belfried tower. 1860 MRS. GASKELL C. Brontë 4 Parsonage, Church, and Belfried school-house.

Belfry (be'fri). Forms: (2-3) berefreid, ber-freit, 4 berfrey, -fray, -froiss, 5 barfray, 5-7 belfray (e, 6 belfroy, belfray, -froy, belfrie, -frie, 6-7 belfrey, 6-belfrey, belfry, 7 belfore, befroy, befroy, 8 belfry.) [ME. berfrey, -ay a. OF. ber-frei, -ai, -ay (also berfro, later belfrei, belfroi, befroi, mod. belfroi), pointing to a late L. type berefrānus, from berefrānus, adopted f. Teutonic bergfrid*; in MHG. bercurit, -frit, berchfrit, berfrit (also berhfride), MDu. bergfert, -frede, in sense 1 below. The subsequent change of the first r to l by dissimilation from following r (as in armarium, almarium, almerie; peregrinum, pelegrin, pilgrim; parafridus, palefrei, palfrey) is common in later med.L.; it is rare, and exceptional in Fr. (where the normal form dropped the r, befroi, beffrei); in Eng. belfray did not appear bef. 15th c., being probably at first a literary imitation of med.L.; its acceptance was doubtless due to popular association with BELL, and the particular application which was in consequence given to the word. The meaning has passed from a 'pent-house' a 'movable-tower' used by besiegers and besieged, to 'a tower to protect watchmen, a watch-tower, beacon-tower, alarm-bell tower, bell-tower, place where a bell is hung.' The sense of 'pent-house' or 'shelter-shed' is retained dialectally in Lincolnshire and Notts.

The etymology of Ger. bergfrid, bercurit, presents some difficulties; but it is generally agreed that the latter part is a form of OHG. fridu, OTeut. fridu-s, 'peace, security, shelter, place of shelter or safety' (cf. the range of meaning of OE. fridu, frid, ME. fairn), the final vowel being dropped as in proper names, Gottfrid, Sigfrid, etc.; and that the former part is the stem of berg-en to protect, defend; the whole meaning 'protecting' or 'defensive place of shelter,' an obvious description of a pent-house fitted to ward off missiles from those to whom it gave shelter during siege operations. (The possibility that berg here means 'mountain' seems precluded by the sense; but see the discussion of the word by Dr. Chance in N. & Q. vi. xii. 284, 412, etc.) For the form taken by bergfrid in Romance, and thus in Eng., cf. the adoption of OHG. fridu in late L. as fridus, fridus 'peace, protection,' the proper names from G. frid, Gottfridus, Colefridus, Galfridus, Geoffrey, and the sb. affray, OF. esfrei, mod. effroi, parallel to berfrei, belfroi. Med.L. had the forms berefrānus, berfredus, bit, bat, belfredus, berie, balte, bati, bati-fredus, with the latter of which cf. the It. battifredo, assimilated by popular etymology with battere to beat (the tocsin), to strike (as a clock.)

† 1. A wooden tower, usually movable, used in the middle ages in besieging fortifications. Probably, in its simplest form, it was a mere shed or pent-house, intended to shelter the besiegers while operating against a fortification; but in its developed form it was constructed with many offensive appurtenances, so as to make it a formidable engine of attack. See the quotation from Ld. Berners. Obs.

The orig. gelāfa, leafe, leeve, and its short form lāfa, leafe, leeve, survived till the 13th c., when the present compound, which had appeared already in the 12th c., superseded both. The be-, which is not a natural prefix of nouns, was prefixed on the analogy of the vb. (where it is naturally an intensive), so that believe, belief, go together, as the earlier gellefan, gelāfa, and liefan, lāfa, did. The vowel of the sb. (ā) and vb. (WSax. ē, Anglian ē) were originally different; but the distinction was lost in ME. On the other hand the final consonants were differentiated in 16th c. the sb. changing from beleue to believe, apparently by form-analogy with pairs like grieve grief, prove proof. The normal mod.Eng. would have been beleue or beleuee.]

1. The mental action, condition, or habit, of trusting to or confiding in a person or thing; trust, dependence, reliance, confidence, faith. Const. in (to, of obs.) a person.

(Belief was the earlier word for what is now commonly called faith. The latter originally meant in Eng. (as in OFrench) 'loyalty to a person to whom one is bound by promise or duty, or to one's promise or duty itself,' as in 'to keep faith, to break faith,' and the derivatives faithful, faithless, in which there is no reference to 'belief'; i. e. 'faith' was = fidelity, fealty. But the word faith being, through OF. fei, feith, the etymological representative of the L. fides, it began in the 14th c. to be used to translate the latter, and in course of time almost superseded 'belief,' esp. in theological language, leaving 'belief' in great measure to the merely intellectual process or state in sense 2. Thus 'belief in God' no longer means as much as 'faith in God' (cf. quot. 1814 in 2). See BELIEVE 1, and 1 b.)

Bellows (be'lowz, be'les), sb. Forms: a. sing. 1. bæls, belz, belis, bylz, bylis, 3 bel, 3-4 bely, ?buly; pl. 3-4 belies, bulies, 5 belyes, belise, belioe, 6 bales, bellies, bellyis. β. sing. 4 belw, belu, below, 5-6 bel(1)owe; pl. 4 belwes, bellows, 5 belwis, -wys, -owys, 6 bellowsse, 5-7 bellowes, 7- bellows, (double pl. 7 bellowesses, still dial.). [Now used only in plural: the sing. was still in use in 15th c., and still later in compounds. The OE. name for 'bellows' was blæst-bel(i)g, blæst-bel(i)g 'blast-bag, blowing-bag' (= ON. blæstr-belgr, Sw. blåsbälg, Da. blæsbælg, mod. G. blasebalg); but already in the 11th c. the simple belg, bylg, bylig 'bag' occurs in this sense in the glossaries. (So also mod. Sw. bälg, and Da. bælger pl. = 'bellows'.) Thence the ME. beli, bely, buly (u), really the same word as BELLY, under which see the remoter etymology. In the sense 'bellows', bely was still used in the sing. by Chaucer, but after 1400 we find this only with the sense 'belly', though the pl. belies, bellies retained the sense 'bellows' late in the 16th c. in literature, and bellis, bellice, is still common in the dialects. But in Wyclif we find another form, belu, belu, in 15th c. bellowe (apparently of northern or north. midl. origin), of which the plur. belwes, belowes, bellows became established in 16th c. as the literary form, bellies being thenceforth used only as the plur. of 'belly' in the modern sense. In later times bellows has often been construed as a sing., 'a bellows', and occasionally has even received a second plural inflexion, bellowesses, which is common in the dialects; cf. 'a gallows', and obs. or dial. pl. gallowesses. Hence also the pronunciation (be'les), the only one known to orthoepists early in the present century, which has however of late largely given place to (be'lowz).

The evidence at present available does not settle whether belu, belu, came down from a non-palatalized form of OE. belu, or from the plural inflexions belga, belgum, while beli represented the sing. forms belig, belige (cf. ME. bel, dai, del, pl. dawes = OE. dag, dagas); or, finally, whether it was a northern Eng. adoption of ON. belgr: for each of these hypotheses something may be said. Bellows is app. cognate with L. folis: see BALL sb. and BELLV.]

1. An instrument or machine constructed to furnish a strong blast of air. In its simplest form, it consists essentially of a combination of bag and box, formed of an upper and lower board joined by flexible leather sides, enclosing a cavity capable of expansion and contraction, and furnished with a valve opening inwards, through which air enters and fills the expanded cavity, and with a tube or nozzle, through which the air is forced out in a stream when the machine is compressed. It has many modifications of form and structure according to its purpose; and the name is sometimes applied to the 'blower' of a blast-furnace.

a. An instrument or machine of this kind used to blow a fire; it may be portable, as the common hand-bellows, or fixed, as a smith's bellows. Often, with reference to the two halves or handles, called a pair of bellows, rarely, as sing., a bellows.

Belly (be'li), sb. Forms: 3-4 bali, 4 baly (e), 4-5 bale, 4-6 bely, (5 bylly), 6 bally, bealy (e), bellye, 6-7 bellie, 5- belly. [ME. bali, bely :- OE. bælig, bælig, earlier bælg, bælg 'bag, skin, envelope, hull (of beans and peas)', identical with ON. bælg 'skin, bag', OHG. balg, MDu. balch, Goth. balgs 'bag, sack', -O. Teut. balgi-z* 'bag', lit. 'inflated or swollen thing', f. belgan, pa. t. balg, 'to be inflated, swell up'. The same word of which the plural appears as BELLOWS. The sense 'belly' did not exist in OE., and has not been developed in the cognate langs. Evidence is wanting to show whether it came directly from the sense of a material 'bag', or whether the meaning 'body' (as the shell or husk of the soul) intervened: cf. senses 2 and 3. The history of the differentiation of belly and bellos is complicated. The various dialectal forms of the OE. word were WSax. bælg, later bylg, bylig, Kentish and ESax. bælg, bælig, Anglian bælg, bælig; these gave the early ME. bali (ū), beli, bali, respectively. Of these beli, bely occurs in sense both of 'bellows' and 'belly'; bali only as = 'belly'; bali(es) only as = 'bellows.' Hence it may be inferred that the sense 'body, belly' arose first in a dialect where the form was bali, baly, and that this form passed with this sense into other dialects, which could thus discriminate bali 'belly', from beli, bali, 'bellows.' Meanwhile the belly dial. obtained the distinction in another way, viz. by the establishment of belu in sense of 'bellows': thus the Prompt. Parv. has Bely venter, Below follis. Finally the pl. belwes, belows was generally adopted in that sense, and beli, bely became the literary form for the part of the body. Bally still occurs dialectally, e.g. in Lancashire and Shropshire.]

¶ Belt of pater-nosters or of Our Fathers:

In the Acts of the Council of Celchyth, an. 816 (Haddan & Stubbs Councils & Eccl. Doc. III. 584), occurs the passage 'et xxx diebus canonicis horis expleto synaxeos at vii beltidum, Paternoster pro eo cantetur,' of which the latter part 'at the seven bell-hours let the Paternoster be sung for him,' has given rise to one of the most grotesque blunders on record. The OE. words at vii beltidum, 'at the seven bell-hours,' a gloss on 'canonicis horis' preceding, were taken by Spelman as Latin, and construed with the following word as a 'paternoster of seven belts,' which he explained as a rosary. Du Cange repeated the explanation, though questioning the existence of the rosary at that date. Johnson the Nonjuror (Eccl. Laws 1720) elaborately described 'belts' set with studs serving the purpose of a rosary. Scott (Suppl. to Chambers, 1753) suggested as a better rendering, 'a paternoster to be repeated seven times.' In all these there was an attempt to construe the passage, but in later 'explanations' the grammatical construction has been dismissed, and 'vii beltidum, paternoster' transmuted into 'seven belts of paternosters,' as in the following curious specimens of modern mythology:

1844 LINGARD Anglo-Sax. Ch. (1858) II. ix. 62 The frequent repetition of the Lord's Prayer, technically called a belt of Pater-nosters. Note. Beltane (beil'tn). [Adopted in Lowland Scotch from Gaelic bealltainn, bealtuinn (in Irish bealltaine, Manx boalltinn, boaldyn) the Celtic name of the first of May, the beginning of summer.

Old forms are bellene (in a text), belltaine, belline in Cormac's Glossary (9th to 12th c.). The first is prob. the earliest quotable form of the word, of which the original meaning seems to have been unknown even to the glossarist, since he makes a desperate guess at it by transposing bel-tine or bit-tene into tene-bit, and explaining bit as 'Bil from Bial, i.e. an idol god', evidently meaning the Bel, or Baal, of the Old Testament; so that bel-tene became 'fire of Bel', or (7) 'Baal'. Dr. Whitley Stokes has shown that the latter part of the word is not tene 'fire', since this is a -t stem (Old Ir. tene, tened), while bellene is a feminine -ya stem. Whether it can be a parallel derivative of the same root, or whether, as is more likely, the notion that -taine was = tene 'fire' is due merely to 'popular etymology' cannot be determined. (The ancient Gaels kindled bonfires not only on Beltane, but also on Lammass and Hallowmas. The rubbish about Baal, Bel, Belus, imported into the word from the Old Testament and classical antiquity, is outside the scope of scientific etymology.)

1. The first day of May (reckoned since 1752 according to Old Style); Old May-day. The quarter-days anciently in Scotland were Hallowmas, Candlemas, Beltane, and Lammass. Beltane day (Gael. la bealltainn) appears sometimes to have been identified with the nearest Church Feast, the Invention of the Cross (May 3rd), and the name seems even to have been applied to Whit-sunday (May 15th), when this took its place as term day.

2. Name of an ancient Celtic anniversary celebration on May-day, in connexion with which great bonfires were kindled on the hills.

This use of the word appears in English much later than the preceding, and only as an alien term applied to the Celtic custom; it may be the original use in Celtic. Cormac's Glossary explains belltaine as 'two fires which the Druids used to make, and they used to bring the cattle [as a safe-guard] against the diseases of each year to those fires.' Also under Bil, 'a fire was kindled in his name at the beginning of summer always, and cattle were driven between the two fires.' Various accounts of Beltane observances lingering in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, are to be found in 18th c. writers, and esp. in the old Statistical Accts. of Scotland 1794-99. A large number of these are collected in Jamieson.

Bemy, obs. form of BEAMY.
Ben (ben), adv., prep., a., sb., Sc. and north. dial. Forms: 4 bene, 5- ben. [Appears first in 14th c. There is no cognate in Scand. languages; so that it must be a dial. variant of ME. binne, BIN 'within':—OE. binnan, cogn. w. Du., Ger. binnen.]

A. adv. Within, towards the inner part; esp. in or into an inner part of the house relatively, in or into the inner part absolutely; into the parlour, etc. from the kitchen; in the parlour or chamber.

The words but and ben have special reference to the structure of dwelling houses formerly prevalent in the north, in which there was only one outer door, so that it was usual to enter through the kitchen into the parlour, and through the latter to an inner chamber, bedroom, or the like. In reference to the kitchen, the two latter rooms are ben and far-ben respectively; they constitute the ben-end of the house: in reference to the parlour, the kitchen is but, or but the house, or the but end. These phrases are retained even in more modern houses, where the parlour has a separate entrance: 'go but' = 'go into the kitchen'; 'come ben' = come into the parlour, etc. Also apartments on opposite sides of a passage are said to be but and ben with each other, though neither is farther out or farther in than the other: come ben, go but are then used of either. Their occupants are said to live but and ben with each other.

Bench-mark. A surveyor's mark cut in some durable material, as a rock, wall, gate-pillar, face of a building, etc., to indicate the starting, closing, or any suitable intermediate, point in a line of levels for the determination of altitudes over the face of a country. It consists of a series of wedge-shaped incisions, in the form of the 'broad-arrow' with a horizontal bar through its apex, thus ↗. When the spot is below sea-level, as in mining surveys, the mark is inverted.

[The horizontal bar is the essential part, the broad arrow being added (originally by the Ordnance Survey) as an identification. In taking a reading, an angle-iron 7 is held with its upper extremity inserted in the horizontal bar, so as to form a temporary bracket or bench for the support of the levelling-staff, which can thus be placed on absolutely the same base on any subsequent occasion. Hence the name.]

4. A shape or size in which ox- or cow-hides are tanned into leather, forming half of a 'butt.'

A 'butt' is the entire hide of the back and flanks reduced to a rough rectangle, by what is technically called 'rounding,' i. e. cutting off the surrounding thinner parts (the hide of the head and shoulders, and of the belly and shanks on each side of the 'butt'). When this is cut in two by a line down the middle of the back, before tanning (as is mostly done in Scotland and the north of England), each half is called a 'bend.' Butts and bends contain the thickest and strongest hide, the qualities of which are further developed by special processes in tanning, so as to make the stoutest leather. Hence

More, Grafton, etc., though band(e), alone appears in the versions of the Bible (Tindale and Coverdale have bonde in John xviii. 3, where the later versions have bande; but the word is not frequent in any form before the Geneva version of 1557). Bend is rare after 1600; the Shaks. folio of 1623 has always band. B. (with object expressed) prep.

The prepositional use of beneath seems originally to have been introduced to express the general notion of 'lower than,' as distinguished from the specific sense of UNDER. But in process of time beneath was so largely used for under, that BELOW was laid hold of to express the more general idea. In ordinary spoken English, under and below now cover the whole field (below tending naturally to overlap the territory of under), leaving beneath more or less as a literary and slightly archaic equivalent of both (in some senses), but especially of under. The only senses in which beneath is preferred are 7 ('beneath contempt'), and fig. uses of 4 (e.g. 'to fall beneath the assaults of temptation').

Bent (bent), sb.¹ Also bennet. [A word of difficult history. In the sense of 'stiff-grass' or 'grass-stalk' (in which alone the variant bennet occurs), it appears to be the representative of OE. beonet, found as a frequent element in proper names, as Beonet-leah Bentley (see Index to Cod. Dipl. xvi Saxon). These names do not show the meaning; but beonet—earlier binut* (with eo as u—umlaut of i), in OS. binet (Schade), is phonetically identical with OHG. binuz, MHG. binex, binz (str. masc.), mod.G. binse 'rush, reed, stout grass growing in wet places'—WGer. binut*, of unknown etymology. But distinct instances of this sense are not found before the 15th c., while the sense of 'grassy field or surface' is common in northern writers from the earliest appearance of northern literature. Whether this is the same word is uncertain: it is possible enough that the pl. bents was used for a place where 'bents' grew (cf. local names like Tolley Bents near Sheffield) and that this led to the use of the sing. bent as 'open grassy place.' They are here united provisionally.]

I. 1. A name given to grass of a reedy or rush-like habit, or which has persistent stiff or rigid stems; also to various grass-like reeds, rushes, sedges, and other plants.

Britten and Holland Plant-n. give a long list of grasses and other plants, to which the name, either simply or with attribute, is locally applied: by the seashore it very generally means the Sea Reed Grass, Psamma or Ammophila arenaria, but also Carex archaria, Elymus arenaria, Triticum junceum, according to locality; on northern moorlands often Juncus squarrosus, but also Nardus stricta, etc.; in some pastoral and hay districts Cynosurus cristatus ('Hendon Bent'), Agrostis vulgaris; in other localities, Phalaris arundinacea, Scirpus lacustris, or other marsh-grasses, bulrushes, reeds, or sedges: in Chester and Wiltshire, the name is even given to the common heath and ling, perhaps because they grow on bents: cf. 'heath.'

[OE. beorn, earlier biorn (:-bern*) 'warrior, hero, man of valour,' hence 'man' pre-eminently, vir, drīp; a word exclusively poetical; of disputed origin. The ME. forms were very varied; the most common midland type in 14th c. was burn(e); after 1400 the word was retained chiefly in the north, where it was a favourite term of alliterative poetry; in the form berne it survived in Scotch till after 1550. In some of its spellings it was occasionally confounded with forms of BAIRN, and BARN; with the latter it was often actually interchanged: see quots. 1205, 1300.

Phonetically, OE. beorn 'man of valour' answers exactly to ON. björn, gen. bjarnar, 'bear' (:-O'Fut. bernu-s, the Celtic representative of which Prof. Rhys sees in the Gaulish proper name Brennus); but the ON. word has never the sense of 'warrior,' while the OE. has never that of 'bear.' To this, however, a striking analogy is offered by the case of OE. esfor, ON. esfur (:-O'Fut. esvoro-s = L. aspr), which has in Old English only the sense of 'wild boar,' in ON. only that of 'warrior, hero.' The use of the name of a fierce animal as a fig. appellation for 'warrior, brave,' seems very natural, and the fact that OE. beorn belonged only to the language of poetry and is never found in prose, suggests that it was a word of which the literal sense was lost, and only a figurative one traditionally retained. Nevertheless some eminent Teutonic scholars doubt the identification. Some have considered the word to be an early variant of bearn, BAIRN, or at least a cognate derivative of bearn to BEAR. Mr. H. Bradley has suggested the possibility of connecting it with the British root of Beornice Bernicia, Welsh byr-neich, and of Welsh breknin king; but the nature of the connexion is not apparent.]

Berth (bɛrθ). Also 6-7 byrth, 6-9 birth.

[A nautical term of uncertain origin: found first in end of 16th c. Most probably a derivative of BEAR v. in some of its senses: see esp. sense 37, quot. 1627, which suggests that berth is = 'bearing off, room-way made by bearing-off'; cf. also bear off in 26 b. The early spellings byrth, birth, coincide with those of BIRTH 'bearing of offspring, bringing forth', but it is very doubtful whether the nautical use can go back to a time when that word had the general sense 'bearing'; it looks more like a new formation on bear, without reference to the existing birth. (Of other derivations suggested, an OE. beorgb*, 'bearth' 'protection, defence, shelter' (see BARTH), and Icel. byrdi 'the board, i. e. side of a ship' (see BERTH v. 2), do not well account for the original sense 'sea-room'. The sense is perhaps better explained by supposing berth to be a transposition of north. dial. breith = breadth; but of this historical evidence is entirely wanting.)]

Bet (bet), sb. Also 7-8 bett. [Of uncertain origin; nor is it clear whether the sb. or the vb. was the starting-point; if the sb., we may perhaps see in it an aphetic form of ABET sb. in the sense of 'instigation, encouragement, support, maintaining of a cause': see the quotation from Spenser under ABET sb. 2. The vb. would then be derived from the sb., as in the case of WAGER

sb. and v. It is less easy to get from the sense of ABET v. to that of BET v., since the original construction ought then to be, not 'to bet money on a champion, etc., but 'to bet (i.e. abet) a champion with money,' of which no trace is found.

See however ABET v. 4 in sense of 'to bet that'.

(The suggestion that bet is:—early ME. Beot, 'vow, promise, threat,' has no support in the history or phonology.)

The backing of an affirmation or forecast by offering to forfeit, in case of an adverse issue, a sum of money or article of value, to one who by accepting, maintains the opposite, and backs his opinion by a corresponding stipulation; the staking of money or other value on the event of a doubtful issue; a wager; also, the sum of money or article staked. An even bet (fig.): an equal chance, a balance of probabilities.

† Bet, adv. (and a.) Obs. Forms: 1-7 bet (3-6 <

*batizon-, in OE. betera, BETTER. In the adv. the comparative ending -iz underwent the same phonetic changes as the formative -iz of nouns, and was thus reduced to -e, or lost entirely before the OE. period. (Bet, for the expected bete, probably followed leng, sgft, etc.) About the end of the OE. or beginning of the ME. period, bet(e)re, the neuter gender of the adj., began to be used, in certain constructions, in the place of bet, and, after a long existence side by side, gradually superseded it about 1600: instances of bet just before, and especially after, 1600 are archaisms. This encroachment of betera, beter, better upon bet began in phrases where the adj. and adv. are not easily separated, as in hit is bet or betere (positive 'it is well' or 'good'), and gradually extended to others; the final ascendancy of better was doubtless helped by the fact that bet and other comparatives of the same type (e.g. leng, near) had not the ordinary comparative sign, and were thus less definite in expression. As in similar cases, during the time that bet and better were interchangeable as adverbs, bet was by compensation sometimes used for better as adjective.]

The dat. pronoun was ſubſequentlly changed into the nominative, I, we, were better (perh. becauſe in abs. the two caſes were no longer diſtinguiſhed). Finally this was given up for the current I had better = I ſhould have or hold it better, to do, etc. (Mr. F. Hall has ſhown that in theſe changes, better followed in the main the analogy of liefer and rather.) See HAVE.

Between (biˈtwiːn), prep. and adv. Forms:

a. 1 bi-, betweenum, -an, -twinum, -an, -twinum, -an, 2-3 bitweone(n), -twene(n), bitwine, 3 bitweounen, 3-4 bitwene, 4 bitwine, bytwyne, betwene. β. 1 bi-, betwion, -tulen, bitwien, -tween, -twin, betweon, 2 bitweon, -tween, 2-3 bitwien, 3-4 bitwen, -tuen, (bit-when, bepwen). α. β. (4-5 betweyn(e)), 4-6 bi-, betwen(e), (5 bytwycon, betwyn), 5-7 betweene, 6- between. [The modern between combines two earlier forms: α. OE. bi-, betwēonum, etc., ME. bitwēnen, -twene; β. OE. bi-, betwōn, etc., ME. bitwēn; see BE-.

In betwēonum, Mercian betwīnum, the second element represents an original OE. dative twīnum*, twōcōnum*. In betwōn (only a northern form, Rushworth Gosp. bi-, betwion, betweon, Lindisf. bi-, betwien, bitwēn, Durh. Ritual bitwien, -twēn, -twin), the second element points back, according to Sievers, through earlier twīhen*, twīhon*, to an orig. OE. acc. twīhn (cf. bitwīchn in Erfurt Gloss.). These, twīnum*, twīhn*, answer respectively to Goth. twēhnaim dat. pl., and twēihna acc. pl. neuter, of the distributive numeral twēih-nai 'two each', a derivative of two Two (= L. bi-ni, for dwī-ni* 'two each'), which appears also, but with the simple sense of 'two' (nom. masc.), in OS. and OFris. twēne, OHG. MHG. zwēne (early mod.G. zween).

Betwēonum, later betwōnan, gave the prevailing ME. form bitwēnen, reduced before a consonant, and at length generally, to bitwene; bitwen was mostly northern. But after 1400, when final -e became mute, and was omitted in writing, or retained only as a sign of a preceding long vowel, both forms necessarily coalesced in betwene (= betwēn), whence mod. between. In OE. the original construction was bi sēm twēonum, lit. 'by seas twain'; thence through constructions like frīð freondum bi twēon 'peace friends between', bi twēonum, bi twēon coalesced into prepositions. (Cf. the history of to(us)-ward, to-ward, toward.) Intimately related to between, alike in their elements, and in the process by which these coalesced, are its synonyms betwixt, in ME. betwix, and betwixen, betwix, betwixen, betwix, betwixen. Bitwix was actually, in its origin, a doublet of OE. betwōn, and betwixen an expansion of that, on the analogy of betwōnen. Betwixen and betwix were a parallel pair, formed on the OE. adj. twiski: 'two-fold'. (See Sievers Misc. zur Ags. Gram. § 329.) Bitwix died c. 1300, betwixen c. 1500; betwixt is now archaic, between is the living word.]

¶ Instances of the original construction:

It is however also possible that be-tweox goes back through tweohs* to twiscu* acc. pl. neuter. Much more common in OE. than the preceding. In ME. betwix seems to have been more northern, betwixen, betwixe, more southern; in the 15th c. the loss of the final syllable of the latter finally levelled both as betwix. Already in OE., there appeared occasional instances of betwuxt, -twyxt, with a -t, either phonetic or analogical, but having no significance. This was also rare in ME., but after 1500 became the regular form, except in the north, which retained betwix, in 18th c. Sc. betwixh, betweesh; cf. G. zwischen. (ME. had occasionally bitwixte, prob. a confusion between bitwixt and bitwixe.) There is a late shortened form 'twixt.]

Bevy (bevi). Forms: 5 bevey, beuye, beue, 5-7 beuy, 6 beve, (bevvy), 6-7 beavie, beaule, beule, bevie, 7-9 beavy, 5- bevy. [Derivation and early history unknown; ME. bevey, beue answers in form to OF. bevee, bevee 'drink, drinking' (in mod.F., a drink of water thickened with meal for beasts). This seems to correspond, with difference of conjugation (bevee - bevéta*), to It. bevuta 'drinking-bout, a draught': cf. also beva 'drink, liquor, potion, drench' (Baretti) with beva 'a beavie' in Florio. To explain the Eng. sense, it has been conjectured that bevy may have passed from the sense of 'drinking-bout' to 'drinking-party,' and to 'party' or 'company' generally: but of this there is no known evidence. These old names for companies of men and animals are however very fantastical and far-fetched, as may be seen in the first three works quoted.]

Bewape, variant of BEWAPE v. Obs.

Beware (bīwē+), v. Forms: 2 ben war, 3-6 be war, be-war, 3-7 bewar, 3-5 be-warr, 5 by-war, 5-6 be ware, 6 bewarro, be wayre, 6- beware. [The origin of this is involved: 1. OE. had a trans. vb. warian 'to guard, take care or charge of,' with a compound bewarian 'to defend.' The latter is not certainly found in ME. (where it would have been bewaren); the former survived as WARE, common till 1500 with a dative refl. const.,

esp. in the imperative ware thee! 'cave tibi, take care of thyself, be on your guard, beware!'; and has been retained down to the present day in the simple imperative ware!, as 'Ware holes!' (although in this form it has often since 1600 been mistaken for a contraction of beware! or an interjectional use of the adjective). 2. OE. had also an adj. war 'cautious, cautious, on one's guard,' which survived in ME. as war, ware, common in the phrase to be ware 'to be on one's guard,' of which the imperative be ware! was practically = ware thee! aforesaid. 3. From this equivalence of meaning, be ware early began to be treated in some respects as a single word, viz. as a compound of the vb. ware, thus stepping into the place of the OE. bewarian. As early as 1300 we find it written as one word, and even with by as the prefix, and in 14-15th c. it often followed the verbal constructions of the simple ware, even to taking a direct object, as in 'beware that train' (c 1500 in 1 e). But on the other hand it was used only in those parts of the vb. where be is found, viz. the imper., infin., and pres. subj. (the indic. being I am ware, thou art ware, etc.). After 1600, the verbal aspect so far prevailed that the inflexions bewares, bewared, bewaring, were used by good writers; but these have again been discarded, and beware is now used only where be ware would be a possible construction, viz. in the imper. (chiefly), the infin., and pres. subj. (rarely). The full evidence of these statements will be found under WARE: the following quotations show the relations of to be ware, to ware oneself, ware thee, ware to thee, be ware to thee, beware thee, beware thyself, before 1500.
